

Letters: Put pants law up for a vote

8:53 PM, Mar. 1, 2012

A writer recently suggested that government should not regulate the position of a man's pants. This presupposes the idea that citizens are responsible for their actions.

It's disgusting for me as a male to be in line behind someone with his pants so low he gives the "plumber's crack" line a bad name. It is an atrocity when my granddaughter is with me and she is forced to be witness to this nonsense.

We have laws and ordinances against indecent exposure for a reason. In fact, let's put this on the ballot. We could call it the "Baggy Pants, Butt Exposure" ordinance. If it passes, I'm going to get me a pair of pants five sizes to large, underwear with hearts on them, and I am headed out the door to show my wears!

Sometimes, a law or ordinance is needed because those who commit these offenses have no intention to stop.

If you can't even walk without one hand holding or positioning your pants so that the underwear is on public display, you need to man-up and get with the program of being a responsible citizen. The city doesn't belong to you for your personal insults to the rest of us.

This topic is really about individual responsibility. The writer said that in a free society, an individual should be allowed to do what harms no one else. Really?

Just wait till you see the hearts I have in mind for my underwear!
